Whites mark the spot where Gavin was murdered

●Oldham demands justice for Gavin Hopley

Ten Muslim men arrested over the racist murder of white teenager Gavin Hopley have had murder charges against them dropped. Gavin died in February, six days after being attacked and savagely beaten in the predominantly Muslim area of Glodwick in Oldham, Greater Manchester. The 19-year-old, from Heywood, near Bury, suffered massive head injuries and never regained consciousness after being set upon as he searched for a taxi with friends. The Crown Prosecution Service has now decided to charge the arrested racist thugs merely with violent disorder rather than murder. The red paint seen in the picture top left marks the spot where Gavin was murdered and was apparently thrown by local people in protest at the CPS decision. The picture on the bottom left may give an indication as to the underlying reason behind the dropping of the murder charges. It shows the special financial support and housing privileges currently being enjoyed by the Muslim community in Glodwick - just around the corner from where Gavin Hopley was beaten to death.

●Labour planning 15 new asylum centres

The Blair government is planning to build up to 15 new asylum accommodation centres across the country, many in rural areas. Announcing plans for three pilot sites in Nottinghamshire, Worcestershire and Oxfordshire, Lord Rooker the Home Office minister warned that the plans would not stop there: "We want to make sure it works and could look at up to 12 to 15 centres." He admitted that planning permission is being sought for centres on Ministry of Defence land at Throckmorton, near Pershore, Worcestershire; RAF Newton in Nottinghamshire; and MoD land at Bicester, Oxfordshire.

These sites are among eight originally earmarked by the Government as potential plots for the accommodation centres that have sparked outrage from local residents. Assessments are continuing on three more of those. Sully Hospital in Cardiff; former RAF Turnhouse in Edinburgh; and RAF Hemswell, West Lindsey, Lincolnshire. Lord Rooker refused to say how much the process will be costing the taxpayer but admitted that the Government is looking to provide 3,000 beds in the pilot scheme alone.

●Ex-police Chief attacks Blunkett on crime failure

A former police chief has blamed the Blair government for a chronic demoralisation and widespread malaise in the police service. Detective Chief Inspector Bob Taylor, who was head of operations in the National Crime Squad, has also criticised the Home Secretary David Blunkett for a "dictatorial" style and "cynically" blaming police officers for not containing crime. Mr. Taylor has argued that New Labour's latest proposals for police reforms - including the idea of Community Support Officers (CSOs) - suggest that Blunkett naively and arrogantly believes that he knows better than the police themselves how to deal with the crime explosion.

"The Home Secretary obviously sees himself as a commander-in-chief of police and is quick to rub-bish any opinion that does not align itself to his. He operates like some dictatorial officers I have known over the years." He added: "Ex-colleagues I speak to are visibly demoralised, not only with these recent proposals but also the general lack of support they have been given over a number of years. This malaise is clearly widespread in the service."

●66% of black people want England to lose in the World Cup

The weekly black newspaper New Nation has revealed that the vast majority of black people of African and Caribbean descent living in this country will be supporting the English teams opponents in this month's football World Cup.

66% of people questioned in the survey confirmed that they wanted England to lose, and the same number said they would rather see Nigeria beat England.

Even the well known newsreader Sir Trevor McDonald confessed that, should England make it through to round two and play France, he'd like France to win but he'd be happier still if Nigeria beat England in the group stage. One black person wrote in the New Nation: "The British, are, on the whole, less arrogant, more tolerant and have a better sense of humour than white people on the continent. So, why is it that I take such perverse delight in seeing England get stuffed at sport?"

Breaking open the media and political dam

One of the many interesting revelations to emerge in the fallout from our recent local election success has been the admission from senior BBC executives that they tried to limit the coverage given to the BNP during the campaign. Apparently, Ann Sloman, the BBC's chief political adviser, expressed concern to BBC executives that "too many bids" were being made for BNP spokespeople and urged them to reduce their coverage of the party. What is most interesting about this particular revelation, however, is that Ms. Sloman was totally unsuccessful in her undemocratic attempts to silence the BNP on BBC radio and TV. Not only did senior journalists resist her decree, but subsequent BNP interviews on Radio 4's Today programme and Radio 5 Live, as well as massive coverage on BBC TV news, showed that the BNP story was just too big to censor.

In fact the general media frenzy that surrounded the BNP during and after the campaign was an indication of just how successful the party has been over the past two years in breaking out of the shackles of media censorship. Even the old left have been forced to concede that their traditional no platform approach of trying to silence us is now totally and utterly redundant in the face of what one Guardian journalist has described as the BNP's 'slick, media-savvy operation'.

Of course, this development hasn't happened by accident. It has been a key objective of the political normalisation strategy that the BNP leadership has been pursuing since being elected two years ago. And it is without doubt further vindication of the BNP's ongoing transformation into a modern, sophisticated, professional and mainstream nationalist party.

It has been this approach, moreover, that has allowed us to have such an impact in transforming the parameters of political debate in this country on the issues of asylum and immigration. In particular, the political threat that we now pose in key areas across the country, and the very real threat of that popularity spreading like wildfire, has forced the New Labour government to publicly address these issues when they would have preferred to have swept them under the carpet. Make no mistake about it: Blair and Blunkett are talking tough on asylum because of the BNP. But whatever happens, the BNP is in a win-win situation. If Blair and Blunkett actually took some action to slow down the flood of bogus asylum seekers and illegal immigrants seeping into our country, this would ease the pressure on our taxes and greenbelt, while further legitimizing our position and policies in mainstream political debate. We would then be recognised by people as serving an extremely beneficial and necessary role in the democratic process as a means of pressurizing the government into abandoning unpopular policies and giving people what they wanted. And that is, of course, one of the main reasons the BNP exists.

What is much more likely is that the New Labour bluster on asylum is just empty rhetoric and that they have no intention of doing anything to stop the flood or in halting their insidious 'jihad' against the British cultural identity. Already, in fact, the facade is being blown away by the uproar over their plans to create fifteen, monster asylum accommodation centers across the country, many in beautiful rural areas. In this case, the dashing of raised expectations will be benefiting us especially as there will no longer be any moral argument against our position.

The size and nature of the BNP vote in the May elections should have made it clear to Blair and Blunkett that they are not going to undermine our popularity by pretending to adopt our policies. Quite the contrary in fact. They may, perhaps, be still operating under the myth that it was Mrs. Thatcher talking tough on immigration in 1979 that destroyed the political threat of the National Front. In fact, it was mainly the lack of a politically mature strategy, organization and image on the part of the NF itself that resulted in its inability to take advantage of the favourable political climate and led to its ultimate demise.

And this too is still the key for the BNP in 2002 and beyond. We have to accelerate our recent transformation into a sophisticated, respectable, professional, disciplined and well-financed political organization if we are to take full advantage of the great political opportunities now opening up for us. And we need to do this not only to keep winning in the former heartlands of the Labour Party but to extend our campaign to the equally betrayed areas of "Middle Britain" formerly dominated by the Conservative Party.

The time to do this has never been more right. The Tories now have a leader in Ian Duncan Smith who seems determined to bend over backwards to pander to the anti-British lobby. Playing football with asylum seekers, forcing the resignations of Ann Winterton and Professor Geoffrey Sampson for making politically incorrect comments, and his unwillingness to speak out against the asylum flood, have left millions of traditional Conservative voters feeling abandoned and without a political voice.

Therein lies a massive opportunity for the BNP. By winning his rural, middle-class seat on the outskirts of Burnley, BNP Councillor David Edwards has already shown that we have the ability to take advantage of that potential if we get our message and image right.

And this is the crux of the matter. We have by winning just three council seats created a substantial breach in the political dam that has, for many years, been restraining the voice and wishes of the silent majority in this country. Our potential to remove the dam completely and radically alter the political landscape in this country is now vast. It is now up to us - to you - to ruthlessly transform that potential into results. There is no time for anything else.

MOVING FORWA

NICK GRIFFIN identifies key enemies that the BNP must continue to overcome to ensure further political success

"What can stop us now?" I've been asked by several understandably elated activists over the last few weeks. The answer is simple: We ourselves can unless we ruthlessly pursue our transformation into a mature, mainstream and professional political party.

We have won our victories in spite of an unprecedented barrage of media and far-left smears. But that does not mean that smears should no longer be a cause of concern. Nor does it mean that we should tolerate the faintest hint of idle 'extremism' in our midst. On the contrary, we need to be intensifying our efforts to ensure that both dangers receive not a whiff of oxygen from anybody or anything in our party.

Smear dangers

As you know, I have just spent yet another election campaign as the high profile face of the BNP. I've been approached in streets, shops, garage forecourts and pubs all over the country by ordinary, decent people. Some have been voters, others firm supporters in areas without candidates, others still have been sympathetic but still concerned by what they've seen in the media.

From all these many meetings - which range from a brief handshake to in-depth discussions - I have no doubt that the smears do still have the potential to do immense damage. In fact, if we hadn't had them, we would have won several dozen seats. And we wouldn't even have won the ones we did if a large number of people hadn't concluded that the media and the far-left are lying whenever they attack us.

And this is the crux of the matter. Many of the smears we face are outright lies - the set-up with the gang rapist campaign worker who was in fact the son-in-law of a Labour councillor being the classic example. Some, on the other hand, are facts which often cannot be avoided, and about which our only complaint can be over the media bias in dragging up 20-year-old petty convictions for the typical crimes of working class teenagers when BNP candidates are involved, while ignoring far more recent and serious offences - including murder, rape, paedophilia and fraud - committed by our opponents and by the elected representatives of other parties.

In the middle of these two categories come the majority of anti-

Positive Image: Nick with our 3 new Councillors

BNP smears - allegations that are made up by our opponents, but which stick because they are believable. In some cases, this is because a few individual members -but more often 'supporters' and 'hangers-on'- have continued to associate with some of the failed ideas and attitudes which were commonplace in the party's long-gone days of careless, doomed extremism. Some people may have thought that such attitudes on the part of a few well-meaning 'old hands' could be tolerated. The reality is that such tolerance is neither possible nor desired.

Genuine change

The BNP has genuinely changed enormously over the last few years, and our victories in Burnley and greatly improved showing almost everywhere we stood on May 2nd are partly the reward for those changes. But that very success will now spur our opponents to even more frantic efforts to stop us. In particular, they'll be searching desperately for evidence that we haven't really changed, that the suits and smiles are just a front.

If they can't find some pretty good material to support that thesis over the next two years, we could be on the threshold of a growth and electability surge that will transform British politics, allowing us to take huge numbers of votes and even activists from each of the three old parties, and become a potential party of government.

Conversely, if we don't continue to ruthlessly guard against the immature, thoughtless extremism that gives our opponents enough bits and pieces of evidence to piece together a case against us, they will be able to scare off sufficient numbers of our fellow countrymen and-women to keep us boxed in to a few pockets of support caused by unusual circumstances.

Since all the media need to hang us with are a few loose threads, the time has come to say what needs to be said about ensuring that every last scrap of such rubbish stays out of our party for good.

So what are the main enemies to our continued growth and success? The enemies in question can be summed up as the 'Three Hs' - Hard talk, Hobbyism and Hitler.

The 'Hard Talk' enemy

Hard talk is perhaps the most understandable of the enemies which has to be guarded against. Activists who have to listen to the tear-jerking accounts of the injustice and cruelty which the multi-cultural nightmare inflicts on decent, honest, innocent individuals, families and communities would be less than human if they were not moved to burning anger.

But that anger can only be turned into determination to put things right, not into hatred. It can only be turned into effective political action, not into violence. After our breakthrough in Burnley, our opponents in the media will be queuing up to put journalists into the party as 'plants'. Even if one or two of these are spotted and politely asked to leave, it is unavoidable that some will be convincing enough to be regarded as bonafide supporters. All it then takes is for one genuine but foolish BNP member to allow their anger at what is being done to our country to spill out into blunt hard talking and the media will have their story. Months of work aimed at making the party more mainstream and electable can be thrown away with a few ill-chosen words in a matter of seconds.

The only way to avoid such political banana skins is for every single party member and supporter to live their political life by one basic rule: Never say anything to anybody which your fellow members wouldn't be happy to see quoted on News at Ten. If you can't abide by that rule, then the time to leave is now, before you unwittingly provide some repulsive leftwing hack with a stick with which to beat us.

The 'Hobbyism' enemy

The second 'H' is Hobbyism - the tendency to treat involvement in our struggle as just one more leisure activity, and to let other, more enjoyable forms take precedence. The classic example is football, although the real problem is not 22 men kicking a ball.

There used to be lingering links between British nationalist politics and professional football that went back several decades. The tie-up resulted from several factors, including the huge sales of party newspapers which were once made at many grounds, and the confrontational tactics used in the early days to establish the party's credentials among nationalist activists scattered in several rival groups. In such an atmosphere, the terraces were seen as a natural recruiting ground.

But those days are gone, and they're not coming back. As a matter of fact, the number of people who actually joined up having bought those papers was always very low, and the quality of those who did was often even lower. The same amount of effort put into establishing regular sales rounds in our target wards would always have produced far better political dividends, and a larger and more regular income into the bargain.

As for recruiting 'muscle' off the terraces, there are two problems with the theory that this is of any use. The first is that it was never reliable even when we needed it, the second is that we neither desire nor need it anymore. The BNP is transforming itself into a sophisticated, professional party that is recruiting more and more serious, mature and responsible men and women of all ages and walks of life. We are just not interested in young adult males who are more interested in wasting a Saturday at a football match - let alone risk getting arrested in utterly juvenile confrontations with other British males who probably share their political views.

This 'h' could also stand for 'haircuts', as in skinhead ones. Yes, cropped hair may well be all the fashion at present, but in political terms - Hague and Duncan-Smith notwithstanding - skinheads are associated with thuggery and racial hatred. The England team can get away with it because everyone knows they're footballers, but for non-balding BNP activists to copy Rio Ferdinand and Emile Heskey is to give our opponents in the mass media an open goal. Skinheads - even in suits - scare the public. Of course it's unfair, but I don't make the rules, I'm just explaining some of the things we've got to do to win the game, and ditching of the last vestiges of this unfairly demonised youth cult is one of them.

We are now in the position where hard work is all we need to turn this year's election victories into a whole string of equally stunning results in a further round of local elections next year. If we do so, the resulting roll could take us on to make major league breakthroughs in the London Assembly and European elections in 2004. We now have a real chance to transform British politics, but we have fewer than fifty Saturdays to get the work in. We are attracting more and more quality, respectable people who are willing to sacrifice time, money and effort because they recognise that there is no other choice: we have to succeed. They are not hobbyists and we don't want or need hobbyists.

The Nazi enemy

The third 'H' which we have to identify and actively reject as an enemy is Hitler. Thankfully, the time has long gone when the BNP would tolerate the known presence of deluded individuals as members or on our fringes with a perverted nostalgia for the 1930s. But we now have to promote our anti-Nazi credentials more vigorously, not just to dilute the impact of further media fantasy stories, but to leave no room for doubt in the minds of the British people about who we are and where we are going.

There are two main reasons for the pollution of British nationalism over three or four decades by this immensely damaging 1930's political necrophilia. First, there was the fact that several of the leading figures in both the National Front and the old BNP had either flirted with Nazism in the early stages of their careers or, even worse, were still 'closet' Nazis, greatly excited by fantasies of huge parade grounds and "government with the power to govern" (i.e. dictatorship).

Such people, even those who had grown out of their youthful enthusiasm for Mr Hitler & Co, had a vested interest in allowing or encouraging careless extremism and identification with 1930s fascism among each new generation of nationalist activists, so as to minimise the chances of them concluding that their leaders' records were an albatross around our collective neck. Fortunately, these individuals are no longer a factor in the BNP.

The second reason is a little more complex. A key part of the liberal-left's relentless campaign to demonise any white resistance to their genocidal multiracial 'experiment' has been a huge propaganda effort to convince the public that such resistance is a symptom of Nazism. This has led to the utterly erroneous belief that only Nazis have ever stood up for the preservation of the white nations of Europe.

This is completely and utterly wrong. It's not just a matter of those Muslim divisions in the Waffen SS. As a matter of historical fact, awareness of the dangers posed by mass non-white immigration can be found among a myriad of different political groupings and ideologies. In Britain, for example, a proto-nationalism based on ethnic identity can be traced back not just to Elizabeth I's decision to expel the 'Blackamoors', but also to some of the theorists of the radical wing of the Parliamentary forces in the English Civil War. More recently, Bob Blatchford and a number of the founders of the early Labour party were outspokenly opposed to mass immigration.

Overseas, the same links between 19th century movements for workers' rights and white cultural identity were marked not just in Europe but also in North America and Australia. Asiatic immigration into the Western USA and Australia, on a scale that would already have turned them into parts of China, was stopped and reversed not by Nazis but by working class socialists. Nor was 19th century nationalist consciousness just a matter of 'rough necks' worried about their jobs. Intellectuals such as William Morris and Jack London were also speaking out for white survival decades before Adolf Hitler started writing about his admiration for Red Indians.

Nor is it true that Hitler "saved us all from Communism." There is little doubt that his attack on the Soviet Union was a pre-emptive strike that stopped Stalin dismembering Germany in 1942, but Hitler had only got into such a position by agreeing to carve up Poland with Moscow in the first place. Had he not done so, Stalin would never have got the opportunity which allowed him to seize half of Europe in 1945. And had Hitler not had such a psychotically hate-filled attitude to the Slavs, he would have armed the white Russians and let them do the job of destroying the Bolshevik tyranny. By refusing to do so, he doomed the flower of European youth to annihilation in the frozen wastes of the Eastern Front. Let's face facts: Hitler was a disaster not just for Germany, but for the entire white race.

Democracy not dictatorship

Then there's the question of political direction. The fundamental principles of the modern BNP - Security, Identity, Freedom and Democracy - stand in fundamental opposition to those of Nazism. Totalitarianism was the cornerstone of the Hitler regime. Hitler demanded - and got - the abolition of democracy and creation of a totalitarian state in which the wishes of the ordinary people could only be represented in some mystical, telepathic communion between the ruler and his subjects. The British National Party is working for a massive extension in direct democracy through Citizen's Initiative referenda at local and national level. The difference could not be greater.

The Nazis sought to create a European Economic Community in which all the national economies of Europe would serve their Greater Germany. The new BNP fundamentally opposes the underlying federalism of the European Union. We are determined to restore and enhance Britain's economic and political sovereignty.

Other Hitlerite policies are equally unattractive to anyone who bothers to analyse them. The Nazis created a corporate state, a mixture of big capitalism and state control. British nationalists follow the Distributist tradition established by home-grown thinkers like GK Chesterton and Hilaire Belloc, and so we favour small, privately owned businesses, workers co-operatives and other such mechanisms which spread the benefits and responsibility of private property to the largest portion of the population possible.

Hitler's state largely turned its back on the ideal of the independent family-run mixed farm, basing food production on the extensive, chemical-based agriculture which has created an environmental and health disaster throughout the West. The BNP champions the recreation of the family farm as the cornerstone of organic British agriculture.

Cultural identity not racial superiority

More importantly, there is a massive difference in how we see ourselves and the rest of the world in comparison with the Nazis.

Nazism was an aggressive and expansionist ideology based upon a philosophy of racial superiority and domination of other peoples, in particular the huge portion of the white race known as the Slavs, who Hitler wanted to turn into slaves. The BNP is first and foremost a party of human rights, working for the democratic enfranchisement of the dispossessed British majority. We are committed to preserving and promoting the unique cultural identity of the British Isles. We believe we have a right to be ourselves in our own land.

At the same time, we value and encourage the rich cultural diversity that exists in the world and support the rights of other peoples to be themselves in their own lands. Our attitude is summed up in Article 1, Point 1 of the United Nations Covenant on Civil and Political Rights :

'All peoples have the right of self-determination...to freely determine their political, social and cultural development.'

This attitude is reflected in how we must continue to conduct ourselves politically. To try to combat the threat posed by mass immigration and Islam to Western values of freedom and democracy by bombastic or aggressive rhetoric, or by proposing the rebirth of a totalitarian government, is not only anathema to who we are and what we represent, but would guarantee certain rejection by the vast majority of people in this country- the pig-headed, bloody-minded, self-consciously individualistic Anglo-Celts. To put things at their simplest, would you like to live under a system where someone else tells you what to think? No? Then you, like me, cannot be a Nazi.

There actually exists, absurdly and obscenely, a totally separate group calling itself the 'British Nazi Party.' Anyone who thinks there is, or should be, any connection between the ideas and image of that sad little group of losers and the modern popular nationalism of our own British National Party, is a menace to our human rights struggle, and should go off and join those cranks.

Our future

Nearly ten years ago when the BNP won its first ever councillor in Tower Hamlets, it was relatively easy for the media to focus on pictures of shaven headed young men - or old images of the then leader of the party dressed in Nazi style uniform - as representing the true face of the BNP.

Compare that to the pictures of newly elected BNP councillors David Edwards, Carol Hughes and Terry Grogan that were broadcast around the world on Friday 3rd May. Those pictures by themselves shattered in one go all of the lies, smears and fabrications that large segments of the media had spent so much time and effort creating in the weeks leading up to polling day. Suddenly the deceit came abruptly to a halt - exposed by the smiling faces of three good-looking, intelligent and respectable BNP councillors celebrating their democratic election victories.

That is how much the BNP has changed. That is the new face of our party. That is our future. The rest is history.

GARY SHOPLAND - the BNP's athlete extraordinaire

BNP member &
 Marathon Man Gary
 Shopland

Age: 39 Height: 6ft Weight: 13st
 (fully trained): bodyguard

1983 The Quadrathon - Gary took part in the World's Toughest Race after seeing it advertised in The Sun. It involved a 2 mile sea swim, 50-race walk, 100-mile cycle ride and a full 26.386 mile Marathon. It was Gary's first event and, with minimal training, he came 42nd and was the youngest to finish the event.

1984 The Quadrathon - Gary came 11th. Also completed several Iron Man Triathlons and became Tri-Marathon Champion. Cycled the length of the Pyrenees - 1000 km - in 43 hours.

1985 - 86 Ran the Andes Mountain Range, covering 5,350 miles in a nine-month period. Received honours from the Princess Royal at the Royal Albert Hall for raising £20,000 for Save the Children.

1987 501 miles in Death Valley,

California in 19 days. This was more than a Marathon per day in the hottest place on Earth. Filmed by the BBC's QED series.

1988 Ran 300 miles in four days - John 'O' Groats to Pitlochry, plus other 100-mile and 50-mile running events for charity.

1990 Professional diver training.

1991 350 miles in seven days to raise money to send a sick child and his family to Disneyland, Florida. Also a 50-mile treadmill run in 7 hours 30 minutes.

1993 Speed Marching World Record Attempt during the Pennine Marathon. Gary missed the record but completed the Marathon.

1994 Speed Marching attempt in the Abingdon Marathon. Gary beat the earlier record by 18 minutes 54 seconds, but he has now lost his record to someone 3 minutes and 47 seconds faster.

1996 Received the coveted Red Beret in 4 Para (Territorial Army).

1997 Filmed by the BBC's Record Breaker series on the London Marathon.

1998 100km Championships at Greenwich. Started Football Coaching Course with Huddersfield Town.

1999 Training and planning Everest Base Camp to Kathmandu world record.

2000 The record-breaking Everest-Kathmandu run planned by Gary went ahead. Gary was hospitalised by a combination of altitude sickness, heat exhaustion and exposure after covering 60 miles in 16 hours. But the record was broken by Sherpa Kumar Limbu.

2002 Attempted World Record 24-hour treadmill run to raise money for West Yorkshire Air Ambulance. Gary was on course to beat the 100.75 mile record until he was stopped by injury caused by sub-standard equipment after covering more than 40 miles in just seven hours.

Id: Gary, your record speaks for itself, but why did you get involved in endurance events and record-breaking events in the first place?

GS: When I was at school I was told that I couldn't do games because of my asthma. I was put in goal so I wouldn't have to run very far, but on the one occasion when I was allowed to play in a different position I loved it. I started running and haven't stopped!

Id: What goes through your head when you're running for days on end through a desert? Does your mind wander back to home?

GS: Determination to get the job done, in Death Valley's case I battled with the sun, as that was the enemy which could stop me from achieving my goal; it was a battle of will, my will to beat the heat. I did think of home as I wanted to go home a success, safely and not in a wooden box.

Id: Out of all the places you've been, which is the most beautiful, the worst, and the one where you'd ideally spend the rest of your life?

GS: The most beautiful were the high Himalayan and Andean snow capped peaks, and the deserts, although running over or through them tended to bring out the worst in them all. I can see myself in a secluded farmhouse, writing my memoirs looking back at my life proud of my achievements and helping to make my country into a better place.

Id: When you're at the limits of your endurance during a competition, what keeps you going?

GS: All the effort that I have put in training, the long hours, thinking positive, even when everything seems against me. In the end, just saying to yourself that you'll not give up - and meaning it - is what gets you through.

Id: On a 24-hour treadmill attempt, what do you do about toilet breaks, and refreshments?

GS: You're allowed to get off, but the clock keeps ticking, so the longer you stay off the more time you lose. I take a pee break every couple of hours. As for refreshments, you have to drink plenty of water and electrolyte drinks, and to eat food with plenty of easily released energy. I ate a lot of bananas. Some people even eat chips, and I tried a handful this time around, but found them a bit heavy.

Id: In your recent attempt at the World Treadmill Record you had to retire through injury. Why was that, and what happened?

GS: The state-of-the-art treadmill which I'd been promised for the attempt didn't arrive at the leisure centre, so I had to use an older and less sophisticated one. It didn't have enough 'give' in the track and was set permanently slightly uphill. After only a few miles my toes started to hurt and, with every clean sock change, my feet looked worse and worse. By the time I finished my toes were bruised black, blistered and split. I was fit enough to take the record, but I just couldn't go any further.

Id: It must have been a disappointment when you had to stop, but having got over that have you made any plans to have another try, do something else, or are you going to retire?

GS: Not a chance of retirement, I will have another go, it would be silly to give up as I have learned such a valuable lesson, and I know I can do it.

Id: What's the proudest moment of your sporting life?

GS: Every time I run and put in an effort I'm proud. Most of what I've done has been tough, but Death Valley was the hardest so I'm most proud of that one

Id: When did you join the BNP, and why?

GS: In 1996. Living in West Yorkshire, I was getting more and more concerned about the threat to our traditional identity posed by mass immigration and multiculturalism. Also, in Huddersfield, I'd been racially attacked twice, and had stepped in on several other occasions to protect strangers who were being attacked by racist Asians. I got a police commendation after one such incident, but after another one of the attackers shouted "We'll end up taking over" as he and his gang ran off after I'd stepped in to protect their victim. That was the thing that made up my mind to join the BNP and help make sure that never happens.

Id: The BNP has changed a lot since then. What do you particularly like about the way in which the party has moved on and grown?

GS: It has matured and rid its self of the thuggish image. More than ever it attracts men and women of all ages and backgrounds - it really is a family party now. The BNP has moved on greatly since I joined. Meetings in West Yorkshire used to involve 10 people or fewer, but now a hundred or more isn't uncommon. Nick Griffin has accelerated our progress and it will be a major party to be listened to and reckoned with in the next few years.

Id: Have you always been active, and what role do you play in the party now?

GS: Yes I have always been active, mainly at the Dewsbury branch, where I'm now branch fund-holder. I'm hoping to become Yorkshire Regional Treasurer shortly. These financial jobs are absolutely essential, because we can't do anything without money, and the members and supporters who give it or help raise it need to be absolutely confident that it's looked after properly. As I have successfully completed courses in close protection security, I also do that job for the Boss (Nick Griffin - Ed) when he's in the region or at major campaign events. Overall, I want to see this party win, and whatever talents I have are always available to help make that happen that bit quicker.

Id: Gary, many thanks for your time - and keep on breaking those records!

On the move in Death Valley

Q:How much more can you afford for the BNP not to fail?

A: The price of a bar of chocolate a day, because that's all you need to invest to help us prevent your worst nightmares coming true.

Can You care that little?

The Trafalgar Club is the fundraising arm of the British National Party. It's members pledge a minimum of £15 per month, in return for which they are:

- entered into a prize draw every month,
- receive occasional special internal bulletins,
- able to attend the annual Trafalgar Club dinner free of charge.

In addition, every fully paid up first year member receives a Trafalgar Club tie (or a personalised organiser file in the case of ladies). The tie carries the first two 'words' of Nelson's semaphore signal before the Battle of Trafalgar: "England Expects."

What makes the Trafalgar Club so crucial to the BNP?
Without the Trafalgar Club the BNP wouldn't have benefited from things such as:

- The BNP mobile billboard truck - to buy, tidy and sign-write. This has been featured on various TV news bulletins as well as in the Mail, Financial Times and Daily Telegraph. It has been bringing in a huge spike in Internet viewing and piles of inquiries.

- The work of full-time campaign organisers in key areas.
- Extra election material in various areas, including the North East of England and key seats.
- Large amounts of extra postage for the piles of enquiries.
- Keeping open our Burnley Bravepages website when the Labour Party tried to pressure the provider into closing it down.
- Various other admin/PR work -everything from phone bills to Internet sites
- Putting nearly £4,000 into new stock to give a huge boost to our merchandising operation. This will of course be bringing-wyrd in regular income and profits which will be ploughed back in to stock and the party.
- Helping the YBNP - paying for things connected to an experimental mailshot to 18 year old new voters in S. London.
- Producing the headline grabbing anti-Islam CDs

What makes it so crucial for you to join the Trafalgar Club today? - opposite a message from BNP chairman Nick Griffin

Dear friend,

As you know, our party performs miracles on a tiny budget, but we could do so much more -if only we had more funds available. The Trafalgar Club raised £18,000 in its first year and £23,000 last year. We are on course to beat that record again this year. It has made a really big difference to what we can do but it is still nowhere near enough if we are really serious about wanting to succeed. Because:

If the Trafalgar Club had just 1,000 members it would be raising £180,000 a year - the BNP could then be fighting elections everywhere and distributing our newspaper as a leaflet. Can you imagine the impact of that ?

If the Trafalgar Club had 2,000 members it would be contributing £360,000 a year and the BNP would be in the political big league.

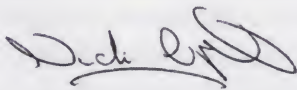

If the Trafalgar Club had 5,000 members it would be generating nearly £1 million a year and we would be unstoppable!

How much would you like this to happen? Well, it depends on you. Trafalgar Club membership costs just £3.46 a week - the cost of a bar of chocolate a day ! That's all you have to invest. Do you care enough about your family's future and that of our country to donate a little more than three pounds a week? You don't have to wait any longer.

It's your choice. It's your future.

Thank you for investing in Britain.

Yours sincerely

Nick Griffin

To join the Trafalgar Club ring 0700 900 2671 or write to PO Box 14, Welshpool, Powys SY21 0WE and request a Trafalgar Club card be sent to your address. The Trafalgar Club is also perfect for members of the public who support the cause of British survival but nevertheless can't join the party and become active.

LYING on the side of deceit and sleaze

Richard Desmond.

The Observer newspaper confirmed on May 5th what the BNP have long known. Senior Labour MP's worked with Charles Clarke, the party chairman, and Downing Street spin-docs to organise and finance Searchlight magazine's production of 200,000 leaflets attacking BNP candidates during the recent local elections campaign.

Gerry Gable, Searchlight's publisher and convicted burglar, was contacted in March 2002 and asked to meet Clarke and other senior party figures to devise the campaign. The meeting, which also included Liberal Democrats, discussed how Searchlight might work with local parties to discredit the BNP's candidates and subvert the democratic process.

Interestingly enough, around the same time - Monday, February 25th to be exact - Tony Blair invited the owner of Express Newspapers, Richard Desmond, to Downing Street for a meeting. Desmond took with him the editor of the Daily Express, Chris Williams, and other senior Express executives. Could it be possible that they met to co-ordinate the vitriolic campaign of lies and hate conducted against the BNP on the front page of the Daily Express every day in the week leading up to polling day?

Tony and Richard

We don't know for sure yet but what we do know is that Blair and Desmond have long shared a murky relationship which extends to manipulating the democratic processes of this country. They apparently both share a connection in Lord Levy, Blair's financial backer, tennis partner, political adviser and personal envoy to the Middle East. And soon after taking over Express Newspapers in November 2000, Desmond was invited around to Downing Street for the first time.

This was despite the fact that a number of backbench MP's were urging Stephen Byers, then Secretary of State at the Department of Trade and Industry, to refer the takeover to the Competition Commission to ensure that Desmond was a 'fit and proper person' to run a newspaper company. A similar referral had stopped the soft-porn publisher David Sullivan taking over the Bristol Evening Post in the 1980s, and Desmond's empire not only extended to newspapers but included pornographic magazines, websites and television channels.

Sleaze

According to The Observer of May 12th, a few weeks before Byers made his decision, Desmond again visited Downing Street and offered to make a £100,000 donation to New Labour in the form of free advertising space during the 2001 general election campaign. Under the new law governing party political funding, however, any donation made after February 15 2001 would have had to have been immediately declared to the Electoral Commission.

If the donation had been made any time by the end of 2000, then it would have appeared in Labour's annual report last summer. This suggests that Desmond's donation was made in the six-week window between January 1 and February 15, and therefore it did not become an issue during the election campaign.

On 7th February 2001, Stephen Byers announced that he would not be referring Express takeover to the Competition Commission, so giving Desmond ownership of the Daily Express, Sunday Express and Daily Star. Days later, moreover, the Labour peer, Waheed Ali, had lunch at the Express headquarters and then, after the election, Margaret McDonagh, General Secretary of the Labour Party, announced she was joining Desmond's organisation.

On reflection, therefore, it should come as no surprise that the Daily Express led New Labour's desperate campaign of lies against the BNP in the weeks leading up to the local elections on May 2nd.

Pornography

That New Labour should share such a cosy relationship with a man like Richard Desmond should also come as no surprise. After all, he is still best known for his work as a pornographer. His television interests include the sex channels Television X and the poignantly named Fantasy Channel, while his publications include Nude Readers Wives and Asian Babes.

These titles obviously give some indication of how he values women regardless of which culture they originate. Some of Desmond's websites even promote group-sex fantasies about girls in Brazil and Bombay being bought for $5 apiece by gangs of tourists.

We trust that this depravity was not a topic of conversation when Desmond sipped tea at Number 10 with Tony and Cherie Blair, nor when he was co-ordinating the anti-BNP smear campaign with the leading members of the New Labour hierarchy. Perhaps also not mentioned over the tea and scones was that Desmond - according to a recent report in The Guardian - is currently being sued by a former employee for racial discrimination. According to Andre Thomas, a German national, Desmond made his life a misery by making derogatory remarks about Germans in his presence and using the "heil Hitler" salute whenever he walked past.

Fabrication

Desmond's reputation for using his newspapers for underhand purposes might also have appealed to New Labour in their unsuccessful attempts to stop the BNP. In the early summer of 2001, for example, an internal memo was leaked to the press which had been written by the then editor of the Sunday Express, Michael Pilgrim. In the memo, Pilgrim complained of constant management pressure from Desmond to do things outside the "legitimate and ethical remit" of a newspaper. "I have been asked on several occasions", Pilgrim declared, "to suppress evidence of wrongdoing...I have been under ridiculous pressure to run unjustified stories to settle scores." Pilgrim was immediately sacked by Desmond for his honesty.

What, it might be asked, would Pilgrim have made of the front page of the Sunday Express on Sunday 6th May alleging that the BNP was linked to Osama Bin Laden?! Of course, as the BNP victories in May showed, more and more people are seeing through these sad fantasy stories. But what is most worrying about the Express campaign in May, is that only the previous month the editor of the Daily Express, Chris Williams, was appointed to the Press Complaints Commission's Editors' Code of Practice Committee which is responsible for drafting and framing the Code of Practice which binds all national and regional newspapers and periodicals.

It is clear, therefore, that as the BNP embarks on its next stage of growth, we must be ever more vigilant, disciplined and professional to ensure that the lies of New Labour and their media friends ring increasingly more hollow. Because what is clear to more and more people in this country is that we have the truth on our side and they are more willing than ever to listen.

PartyNews

West Midlands St Georges

West Midlands BNP did England and the party proud on St Georges Day with a resoundingly successful all day family festival held in the heart of the Black Country. Several hundred people attended events and celebrations throughout the course of the day, while in the evening over 200 people packed a meeting addressed by BNP Chairman Nick Griffin.

Tremendous meetings in Lancashire

Around a 100 people celebrated Burnley BNP's election successes at a great meeting in the town on May 30th. Chaired by Regional Organiser Chris Jackson, the meeting opened with a speech by the man who made it all possible, Burnley organiser Steve Smith. Chris then introduced new Voice of Freedom editor Martin Wingfield, whose brilliant local publicity material did so much to pull in the votes. BNP councillors Terry Grogan and Carol Hughes received a well-deserved standing ovation and each thanked their campaign workers and laid out some of their ideas as to how to build for the future on the successes already achieved. After a short break, Mr Jackson then introduced BNP Chairman Nick Griffin, who gave a tremendously well-received speech, focussing on the potential for a really big BNP breakthrough in the series of elections due in May 2004.

The audience included a carload of members from London who drove up to congratulate Burnley's campaigners and councillors, and to put £100 in the collection.

The previous week witnessed another important stage in the rapid development of the BNP in Lancashire when two people short of two hundred packed into just the second ever meeting of newly-formed Blackburn BNP. What an evening! The meeting was chaired by Chris Jackson, who spoke briefly about the great work being done in Lancashire by the party, and how Blackburn can follow the success of Burnley. Chris then handed over to Nick Griffin, who gave a barn-storming speech which stressed the need for the BNP to be mature and moderate in its demands. As Nick pointed out, an earlier nationalist electoral breakthrough - when John Kingsley-Read won a seat in Blackburn in 1976 - was destroyed by personal power-grabbing and politically suicidal extremism. Nick also explained the truth behind the unfounded allegation that Kingsley-Read was a traitor to the Cause. He was in reality part of a group of 'retired' patriots who arranged to set up the anti-British smear magazine Searchlight for a devastating libel action by feeding its convicted criminal editor Gerry Gable with false information. Unfortunately for Kingsley-Read, however, he died before the 'sting' was carried through, leaving Gable convinced that the hero of white Blackburn in 1976 had turned his coat.

Older members of the audience, some of whom had been involved in that distant victory, were particularly pleased to hear Mr. Griffin set the record straight: "Blackburn's most famous nationalist to date may have been a little too fond of his beer, but he was no traitor. He was a man who came close to changing the course of British history, and we must learn the lessons of the failure of the 1970s and make sure it doesn't happen again. This time, we won't get another chance."

Cultural identity

British Pub Games by Trevor AGNEW

Despite what some people may think, pub games are alive and doing as well as can be expected in the days of play stations, the restaurantisation of a lot of pubs, and folk not getting down the local as much. One historian has described pub games nights as a kind of theatre. Each pub has its own unique setting, its own cast of characters and its own style of play, and thousands of them still play games. The games played are numerous and varied in style, with each region of the country having its own curiosities.

Regional Variety

For instance, in areas such as Leicestershire or Northamptonshire many pubs have their own skittle alleys and compete in strong leagues, whereas in many parts of the country skittles is unheard of as a pub game. In most parts of the country dominos is played with the pieces going up to double six. In parts of the North West, however, it is usual to play with a double nine set. There even existed a double twelve set which had no less than 91 pieces in contrast to the standard 28. But this game was rarely played - probably something to do with the fact that it was too big and cumbersome to offer a really interesting game. The last reported double twelve league was in Staffordshire.

Even the game of Darts has varied from area to area. The everyday Dart board is what is known as the 'London board', but there has been many others including the Norfolk, Grimsby, Burton, Yorkshire, Tutbury, Manchester log end board, and East London "fives" board. Also, there have been the Kent, Lincoln, Corringham and Irish boards. The arrows used in Darts are even more varied than the boards themselves, with each player having their own particular preference with weight, style etc. Years ago a dart existed known as the French dart, this was a dart with a wooden shaft loaded with weights on the inside. Darts Technology however took off in the nineteen seventies with the introduction of tungsten (rumoured to have been a spin off from work on the Concorde aircraft in the Bristol area). Tungsten darts concentrate weight into a small area giving a heavy dart with a slim body, making it easier to fit three darts into a treble.

Of course, Football is a game with a strong connection to pubs, with many pubs competing in Saturday and Sunday morning leagues. Many pub names also have a football derivation such as The Rovers Return in Blackburn, which was named in 1970 after Blackburn were relegated from the top flight. The Happy Wanderers was named after Bolton won the FA Cup in the 1950's and the nearby Lion of Vienna was named after a splendid performance by Nat Lofthouse against Austria. The Kings Head in Denton used to have a sign up showing Dennis Law, and pubs with club nicknames such as The Magpies abound throughout the country. Many pubs also double up as an unofficial HQ for the diehard supporters to meet up in before games.

The Yard of Ale

The Yard of Ale is a game which may be found appealing to the very thirsty amongst us. The basic gist of the game is to down a three pint tube of beer as quickly as possible. The tube is three feet long with a bulb at the far end and a funnel shape for the mouthpiece. It is in fact a trick glass and great skill is required to control the pace of the flow because when the tube is raised to a certain angle the bulb gushes down with great speed. One way to beat this is rumoured to be to just raise the glass, sipping and turning it gently all of the time. One cannot afford to gulp irregularly otherwise an airlock will form which will break and send the ale cascading down the glass and over your shirt.

At the Royal Oak in Bishops Cleeve, Gloucestershire in 1985, one fellow by the name of Peter Dowdeswell downed a three pint yard of ale in just five seconds! One Bert Foster was Oldham's champion black pudding eater and for an encore he would down a half of beer for every time Big Ben struck at noon on the radio - this means that Bert drunk an amazing six pints in half pint gulps in approximately thirty seconds!!!! There are regular yard of ale competitions including one at the Greyhound in Tinsley Green, Sussex, which coincides with the rather tame sounding World Marbles Championships on Good Friday. There is even a pub called the Yard of Ale in Stratford where the landlord will reputedly officiate competitions if given enough notice.

Racing of various animals and insects has also been quite a popular pastime in many a pub, ranging from the likes of beetles and tortoises to ferrets and mice. A Dorset holy man in the 1930's condemned Tortoise racing saying that the pubs involved were exceeding their legitimate purpose as a place of refreshment! The race saw tortoises complete with mock up jockeys on their backs contesting to be the first across the finishing line. A pub in Evesham was a popular venue for beetle racing with enthusiasts turning up from all around Britain with their runners who were transported in matchboxes. Late September sees the annual world ferret racing championships at The Queens Head in Eye, Suffolk. The course is a 30ft length of drainpipe and the record stands at 15 seconds. Recent events have seen around about 30 entrants. One pub in Bishop Auckland, County Durham arranged a mouse race to coincide with the Derby at Epsom. There were to be 18 runners along an 8ft track with cheese at the far end. Unfortunately the landlord had housed male and female mice together in the week prior to the race - the result was that 15 of the runners became pregnant and the other three were too tired to compete.

Pitching games

Pitching is also quite a popular form of pub games. Quoits, for example, was at one time very popular in both industrial and rural areas -as was tossing the horseshoe (which is quite similar to quoits), ringing the bull, and pitch and toss. Ringing the bull or alternatively stag or wild boar consists of a bulls head mounted on a wall with a hook sticking out from its nose. The contestant then has to try to get a heavy metal ring which is mounted on a line of string and hanging from the roof to swing pendulum style and hook onto the animals nose - points are awarded accordingly. To people who might find this game too grisly, however, there is an alternative. This uses a crest shaped board with hooks on of different values.

Pitch and toss is a game which has always courted controversy. Not only did it used to be looked down on but it has also been made illegal in the past with games having to be played behind closed doors and with lookouts to give advance warning of any police presence. The aim of pitch and toss is really quite simple : competitors must pitch their coin as close as possible to an agreed target - the one nearest takes all the coins thrown. One person stumbling upon a game of pitch and toss is reported to have exclaimed that the floor was just a mass of silver. The games bad reputation is rumoured to have come about because a certain monarch didn't like the idea of coins with his head on being cast about in dive bars !

Possibly the most eccentric competitions have been organised by the landlord of the Neuadd Arms in Llanwrtyd Wells. This pub is renowned for bog snorkelling where the competitors swim two lengths of a channel cut in a peat bog on the edge of the town; the mountain bike bog leaping point to point over a rough 20 mile course and the Man v Horse v Mountain Bike challenge over 22 miles of farm tracks, bog, open moorland and forestry roads. The first runner to beat a horse wins a prize.

So there we have it, a brief journey around a few of the many interesting games that have been a part of British pub life over the years. Some are still played as often as they ever were, others not so often and others still quite bizarre. They all certainly beat rotting in front of the television.

All orders to PO Box 287, Waltham Cross, Herts, EN8 8ZU. Postage rates for A5 leaflets are £6.50 per 1,000, £7.05 per 2,000. The exception being the Paedophile leaflet which is A4 in size and therefore £7.05 per 1,000.

ASYLUM SEEKERS? TIME TO PUT OUR OWN PEOPLE FIRST!

Every year, hundreds of thousands of so-called 'refugees' come to Britain and are immediately given the status of 'refugee'. They are then sent to the British Isles. This is a time when our schools are short of teachers, our hospitals are short of beds, and our resources are stretched to the limit. The 'refugees' are sent to the British Isles to live in the hope that they will be able to find work and a better life. But the reality is that they are often sent to the most remote and isolated areas of the country, where they are often treated with hostility and discrimination. This is a time when our own people are struggling to find work and a better life. We need to put our own people first.

CRIME IS OUT OF CONTROL!

CRIME IN BRITAIN IS OUT OF CONTROL! Every time we switch on our TV or pick up a newspaper, we are confronted with reports of crime. Burglaries, car thefts and robberies. Britain used to be a peaceful country, but now it is a land of crime. We need to take action to reduce crime in Britain. We need to put our own people first.

IMMIGRATION?

OPEN YOUR EYES!

According to Britain's leading population experts, the native British people will be a minority in this country by the year 2050. This is a time when our own people are struggling to find work and a better life. We need to put our own people first.

All these children would be alive today if our spineless politicians had the guts to declare war on the paedophiles

The British National Party will stop at nothing to protect our children. We need to put our own people first.
